The application of carbon isotope analyses to dissolved TCE-contaminated water has been constrained by an inability to quantify contaminant concentrations. Most studies to date have assumed concentrations to be true bulk measurements, which has resulted in a spread in measured values that is greater than the natural variation of the delta(13)C signature at TCE-contaminated sites. We report on the use of selective carbon isotope analyses of the triad chlorine isotope system in dechlorination experiments to increase accuracy, reduce variation, and be more generally applicable to environmental matrices. We show that contaminant concentrations can be quantified with the same precision as the delta(13)C(TCE), and that the potential exists for monitoring to determine the response of the biogeochemical system to trichloroethene. These results should facilitate investigation of factors controlling dechlorination rates, give confidence in assessments of rates, and develop estimates of available microbial and chemical remediation options.Q: Possible approach to the problem "Explode a fireworks stand" Here is a problem taken from Explode a fireworks stand.
