Columns Around the time of the second US invasion of Iraq, I read Stephen Schwartz's The Two he wrote about a disciple of Jesus who denounces him on the grounds that Jesus was poor. "It's not about being rich," he argued. "It's about having a loving, generous and wise spirit." I thought of this quote when I read Tim Keller's New York Times op-ed piece, "The Stranded in America," about the waste of human talent in the US because of "spending culture." Cornell University professor of physics, Ben Barres, a member of the National Academy of Sciences who has studied aging for decades, recently gave a lecture at Carnegie Mellon University. He pointed out that on average people in their seventies lived longer than their grandparents because the younger generation has greater physical, mental and emotional strength. Since they live longer, they don't have the time for lollygagging. Senior citizens are more likely to drink alcohol than younger people according to a recent study. This is consistent with the psychological theory that older adults have more deeply ingrained, underlying personality traits, which influence their behavior. Recently I read an article that said one out of every four people who died in the 2011 Japanese tsunami and earthquake had been born between 1950 and 1955. It struck me that you could not distinguish between a tsunami victim from Omo Valley, in east-central Ethiopia, and a US baby boomer. In a more far-reaching sense, it also could be applied to the people of New Orleans, or the people of New York or San Francisco. ♦
